(Al-Sahal Al-Mumtan' brother) The Obedient Long-Suffering Brother (alias)

Peace be upon you

Thank you for your important article...The Muslim's brain is not a receptacle for collecting every disagreement and dead end.

My honorable brother, I agree with you on one issue, and I disagree with you on another...

I agree that whatever is done is done. Al-Taliban's mentality is based on fabrications, wrongdoing, beating around the bush and running away from reality. It's not easy to challenge the world without there being a price.

We saw, through the story of the Syrian brother Abi-Mos'ab and others, how they were making insignificant excuses in order to continue requesting a seat at the United Nations. Once they declare, "We only need the seat to prompt the countries of the world to acknowledge us," they consider that as a license to have rights. Meanwhile, they say "This is a rotten organization; let's send a bad man."

Where can we find people who are able to challenge the world [to recognize that] destroying the idols that were left behind is not as great a sin as joining the United Nations?

What you mentioned in your article of course was a possibility....

The lesser possibility is that they destroyed them because of their faith, which requires destroying these idols. I know from the Sufis that they were destroying children's toys because they are idols (this doesn't mean I disagree with destroying the idols of Buddha).

My honorable brother, I disagree with you on another point, which forms the basis for your analyses about Iran and the Shiites (al-Shi'ah), who are likely to be candidates for the leading role and the organization's successors in the near future.

However, I think that this won't happen. I believe the next conflict in the Middle East after Iraq will involve Iran, because it has proved its inability and failure to handle the Islamic influx and bring it under its blind banner. Iran had a major failure on this issue; however, it is not attempting to achieve this by attacking Israel and America.

How can it fulfill the leadership role when it is incapable of guiding the Islamic insurgency?

Yet Iran should prove its merit to the Muslim generation by attacking Israel, which was created by America. However, this is not suitable for these serious times with so many international infidels making plans. My suspicion is that the greatest achievement of the international infidels at this time is the crazy gyrations of Islamic groups that threaten their very existence to their roots. Whirling around like the Sufi doctrine movement, backward and fanatical, it lacks a clearly-defined doctrine and has taken from the world those who are loyal and honest. Also, its legal basis is shaky.

Isn't a movement like this the hope of the Islamic nation, the objective of revolutionary youth and the protector of Jihad as long as the Nation is accustomed to its protector and its thief...? (TC: Arabic saying.)

I think the next stage is directing a strong blow at Iran to protect Israel from its missiles. The waiting heroes will be found in the staunch Taliban movement... why not? It did show legendary heroism in protecting Osama bin Laden and in destroying the Buddha idols (this heroism didn't cost America anything but some of Mr. Buddha's stones).

It appears that the Taliban movement will participate in destroying the thrones of the rejectionists in Iran. The soldiers of the movement are the Islamic groups, which will achieve great victories for U.S. policy (as long as the battle is under the Mythical Banner).

It doesn't matter if the Nation is in existence for ten years before it understands the danger of delivering the leadership to those who avoided God's law.
